To determine the prognostic importance of epidermal growth factor receptor (EGFR) levels in node-positive squamous cell carcinoma (SCC) of the head and neck (SCCHN) treated with induction chemotherapy and radiotherapy. The study cohort consisted of 174 patients treated with definitive radiotherapy and concurrent chemotherapy for stage III/IVA disease from 1995 to 1998. Data were collected from pathology reports and the medical records. EGFR levels were measured by immunohistochemical staining. Median follow-up was 3.9 years. EGFR levels did not correlate with stage ($P = .76$), N stage ($P = .49$), or overall stage ($P = .27$). High levels of EGFR in the primary tumor were significantly associated with decreased disease-specific survival (DSS) and locoregional control (LRC) (both P The cost and benefits of providing diabetes education to patients with juvenile-onset diabetes. The purpose of this study was to determine the cost effectiveness of providing a structured education program for patients with juvenile-onset diabetes. A model-based decision analysis was conducted comparing the costs and benefits of structured education to patients' routine care. Key decisions were to determine the cost of a structured education intervention, to estimate the probabilities of a beneficial and harmful outcome from a structured education program, and to estimate the impact of these probabilities on the cost-effectiveness. The average cost of a structured education intervention was $395 per person. When 82157476af
